

Sarah Mills is Innovation Programme Manager

Sarah began her professional life as a mental health nurse, before studying Psychology and moving from a clinical to an academic setting at Queen Mary University of London, where she had her first quality improvement role as a clinical effectiveness facilitator. Sarah now has fifteen years of delivering high profile quality improvement projects with the NHS including project manager for the development of NICE national guidelines for a number of chronic conditions; leading the implementation of a review of perinatal pathology services across London; and implementing a CQUIN at a foundation trust. Experienced in partnership working and integrated commissioning Sarah is passionate about system-wide change and enjoys working closely with clinical teams to facilitate the adoption of novel and innovative approaches which impact positively on patient outcomes.
